4 Behavioral Questions Most People Screw Up On

Behavioral interviewing is a style of interviewing that is based on the premise that past performance is an indicator of future performance in a similar situation. Below are links to 4 common questions with strong and weak example answers that catch many prospective candidates off guard. Don't let that be you!

Question #1: Give me an example of a time in your life that you failed?

Question #2: Describe a situation where you had to confront your boss when you believed he was wrong?

Question #3: Tell me about an instance when you had a difficult time getting cooperation from an organization. How did you resolve it?

Question #4: Tell me about a time when you found yourself in an environment that was completely foreign to you.

Volunteer Alert—The Winchester-Frederick County Historical Society

Do some good but not get paid?

The Winchester-Frederick County Historical Society – your neighbor across the pond – is looking for a few students from the Conservatory or elsewhere who are willing to volunteer as assistants at one of our museums for a couple of hours a week.

Volunteering for a non-profit corporation like ours does have benefits, even if those are not financial. You get to meet thousands of visitors from around the country (networking), learn a little history (educational), and add another notch to your resume, hopefully to enhance your chances at securing a paying job in the future.

Contact us at (540) 662-6550, and let us detail the opportunities.
